Teaching

Graduate Courses Taught

- Organizations, Communication, and Health*: Explores the intersections of organizational theories and health within and between organizations, the public, and society.
- Health Communication*: Graduate survey course of health communication. Covers issues of patient-provider communication, interpersonal communication, message design, organizational health issues, and campaigns.
- Organizational Communication Theory*: Graduate survey course of organizational communication theories.
- Conflict Management*: hybrid course exploring a broad spectrum of conflict processes, ranging from micro and discursive practices to macro and international level conflicts.
- Organizational Conflict*: Graduate seminar on conflict in organizations. The course provides an overview of organizational conflict, focuses on theories to help us understand hidden or unproductive forms of conflict, and progress into skills and strategies for managing conflict effectively.
- Communication and Negotiation*: Graduate seminar focusing on the theory and skill of negotiation. Students engage in numerous “real world” and simulated negotiations. Overview of major theoretical perspectives of negotiation and well as negotiation contexts.
- Mediation Theory and Practice*: Graduate seminar in the theory and practice of mediation. Students learn the mediation process from both practical and theoretical perspectives.

Undergraduate Courses Taught

Organizational Communication: Focuses on the pragmatics of communication in organizational settings. Topics include the role of communication in: culture, gender, conflict, leadership, management theories, interpersonal relationships, and ethics.

Communication and Negotiation: Students learn theory and practice of negotiation through a series of simulations and real world negotiations.

Health Communication: Course covers the core areas of health communication, including patient/provider relationships, conformity with medical regimens, design of health promotion and prevention campaigns.

Introduction to Communication Theory: A required course for pre-communication majors that covers the processes of theorizing and provides a survey of key theories across a range of communication approaches. Taught as large lecture and online formats.

Interpersonal Communication: A skills based course designed to increase student's competencies in interpersonal communication. Covers the fundamental theories of interpersonal communication with a pragmatic and applied perspective.

Small Group Communication: A skills based course focusing on the dynamics of communication in a small groups context. Students learn and apply theories in a series of simulated group interactions. They then use these skills in completing a term project.

Dispute Resolution: Focuses on pragmatics and theory of negotiation, arbitration, and ombuds processes. Students learn theory and skills of each process, and how the social context surrounding disputes is likely to effect the process.

Conflict Management: Covers the elementary forms of conflict management, and the role of communication in shaping and changing conflict processes and contexts.

Mediation: Students learn the mediation process and engage in a service learning project. The most recent project involved students developing a peer mediation program for a local middle school. Students developed and implemented the program and trained the first group of student mediators.

Legal Communication Processes: Course focuses on the role of language in legal institutions. Specifically, the course focuses on how discourse creates reality, reveals motivations, impacts credibility, and interacts with social and legal expectations to influence trial outcomes.

Persuasion: This class is designed to be an exploration of the theories of persuasion which guide much of communication research. This course encourages critical thinking on the ways we persuade and are persuaded. This course is also designed to be an opportunity for students to develop writing skills and research abilities.

Communication Research: This course provides an introduction to social science research, and quantitative and qualitative research methods in the study of communication. Students develop an appreciation for the basic principles of communication research, and how to design and conduct basic communication research. Students work on both qualitative and quantitative research projects.

Business and Industrial Communication: students learned theoretical and applied communication concepts for business contexts.

Communication and Media Theory: This course provided a broad overview of the field of communication from a variety of approaches and traditions, focusing on major theories that have shaped its development as an academic discipline. Students examined theory development, compared and contrasted theories, and provided application of theories to various communication contexts.

Communication Theory and Reserch: This class is fundamentally about how we generate, acquire, and evaluate knowledge in the communication discipline. This course examines various communication theories and research methods and methodologies (both qualitative and quantitative) used to address issues of concern to communication scholars.

Technical Communication: Class designed to develop small group problem solving, interpersonal, and public speaking skills to students in technical majors.

Persuasive Speaking: Students develop a portfolio of strategic speeches for use in organizational contexts.

Public Speaking: Introductory course teaching the fundamental theories and skills of effective speaking and listening, message construction, and ethics in communication.

Communication as Critical Citizenship: an introductory hybrid course that focuses on interpersonal communication, listening, small group communication, and public speaking with a central theme of critical citizenship.

Introduction to Communication: a hybrid course that introduces students to the fundamentals of interpersonal communication, listening, small group communication, and public speaking.
